

I prefer full comps. For one I am sure my style tiles are corrupted or something because I tried to imitate what I saw from what I downloaded but I just saw a bunch of overlapping images that didn't make much sense so I had to improvise as to what I thought style tiles was. I think the amount of different styles of pre-production gets me into the mood of thinking through the user experience on which one would services the needs better. However, with a very simplified view of what the wireframes are, what is a professional and simple design ends up looking like something out of a children's book. I typically only spend roughly at most a hour designing in the photoshop comps, yet I spend a lot more time outside during down times, such as when I'm on the bus, just thinking about how to do the design better. I think just sticking with a simpler design and just refining repeatedly would yield better results if I were to repeat this exercise.
